 SHORT STORY OF THE DAY.

Grant Allen, in the Cleveland Plain Dealer, They sat idly on the deck of the Atlanti liner. The moon was rising. It was even-ing in June and they were nearing the 'banks." Even there in midocean the setting summer sun had so warmed the air that they could lounge at their case in the knotty point in the moral philosophy of the knotty point in the moral philosophy of the domestic relations.

"For my part." Maimle Whitmore remarked, drawing her little woolen wrap somewhat closer round her ears. "I say a winters work: ten good teams to haul wood, E; teamsters and laiborers for different points, free fare; cooks, somewhat closer round her ears. "I say a winters news agents, farm hands, man woman's first duty is to her husband." And for my part." Arthur answered, leaning across toward his wife. I say a winters, news agents, farm hands, man and wife cooks. Some man and wife family, seeman s first duty is to her children." How do you make that out, whitmore? the major inquired, lazily, The major had a pretty knack of his own in casuistry.

"Why it runs through all nature." Arthur Whitmore replied. "It belongs to the very essence of the feelings engendered in us by natural selection. The male lights atways for the female and the young; the LAWRENCE NURSERY COMPANY, Opera House block, Lawrence, Kas.

defend himself."

"I remember." the major mused. "I was out tiger hunting in a nullah in India, and I came across a figer, with a tigress and cubs lying hid in the jungle. I fired at the brute and he leaped straight up at me, but the figress and her cubs slunk away through the long, tall reeds of the canebrake. Well, I killed that tiger and went after the tigress, but when I got her at bay she fought like a regular devil for her cubs, I can tell you. So there's your case, Whitmore."

"Yes, it must always be so." Arthur Whitmore continued. "The male as the more active and stronger of the two must fight for the female, as the weaker, yet the protector of the young, must leave the maie to look after himself, and, at all risks to him, must take care of the little ones. They are the hope of the race, the future of the species. The sire has had his day, if he sacrifices his life for his young no great harm can come of it. But the little ones have all the world before them, for their sake the mother must run no needless risk; her first duty is to them; she has borne them and suckled them; to sacrifice them to the father would be unnatural and harmful, and in the wildest sense unfeminine."

"That's all very well for the beasts," Maimie answered, petulantly; "but we are not beasts, and I say, with us, a woman's first duty is always to her husband. Fold up my chair before you come below, Arthur. I'll run down and see how Charlie and the baby are getting on in the state-room," "it opens up an interesting moral question," said the chaplain as Maimie disanand the baby are getting on in the stateroom."

It opens up an interesting moral question," said the chaplain, as Maimie disappeared with a nod down the companion ladder. "It seems to me you make things rather rough for the husband, don't you?"
"Well—no." Arthur answered. "I look at it like this: Parents bestow much love on their children, and the love they receive in return very rarely requites them. It is repaid by the children to the next generation, as the father and mother themselves repay the debt they incurred to their own parents. It's the same with the father. The love he lavishes on the woman of his choice is repaid by her in part to himself, in part as care on her side for the children, who are after all, his children. I don't see how area fer all, his children. I don't see how area fer all, his children. I don't see how area fer all, and repay the surplus of her love to her husband."
"Let's have a cigar," the major said with yawn, "We're growing quite sentimentai."

They smoked and went below. In half an Let's have a cigar," the major said with a yawn, "We're growing quite sentimental."

They smoked and went below. In half an hour all was still, save on the bridge where the officer of the watch paced up and down and peered before him in the dark, for fog was forming.

Fog on the "banks" at night is a terrible thing to the experienced seaman. About 2 in the morning every soul on board was awakened by a terrible crash that jarred horribly through the ship as the came to a sudden standstill. Her iron plates clanked; her timbers creaked and shivered. The bows were stove in. She had run into an icoberg.

In a second the electric light had gone out and all was darkness. Too terrified for screams, men, women and children groped their way through the long corridors and up the companion ladder. On deck a few dim lights made the gloom just visible. The sea was rushing into the forward compartments, leaks had sprung in the after ones, the fires were out; tons of lee cumbered the quarterdeck; the forecastle had disappeared with the violence of the collision. Still all on board was order. The captain wounded by the falling ice, gave the word of command as clear and steady as ever. Sailors were lowering the boats; the second officer, revolver in hand, was holding at bay the half-naked stokers, who had surged up from their noisome hole at the earliest alarm, and were trying to seize the first boat for themselves, regardless of the claims boat for themselves, regardless of the claims that the search of the command and were trying to seize the first what the New Redemption Policy of bay the half-naked stokers, who had surged up from their noisome hole at the earliest alarm, and were trying to seize the first boat for themselves, regardless of the claims of the women and children.

One boat was ready. Arthur Whitmgre tood on the deck, holding his wife's hand tenderly. Maimie pressed the two children tightly against her bosom.

"Women and children forward!" the captain called out in his clear, calm voice.

With a wild sob and a fierce embrace Maimie clung to her husband, "Arthur, Arthur! she cried trembling, "won't they let you go with us!"

"No, darling." Arthur answered, kissing wife and little ones. "This boat is for women and children only."

They took their seats on the thwarts, and were pushed off into the dark deep. After three days at sea in the open boat they reached Cape Race. But Arthur went down on the sinking steamer.

He was justified, after all, lustinet had solved the problem aright for Maimie.

NOW permanently located in the heart of The Midland Advertising Go 1015 1-2 WALNUT ST., Distributors and Signtackers. Four doors nextly of Emery, Bird, Thayer's. One and one-half blocks south of the postoffice. We are now about to enter on our third year in the business of outdoor silvertising. We handle a territory that includes 30,000 people and takes 60,000 pieces of advertising matter to cover. We get a piece to every house. Miss none! Some days our men put out only 500 and less in sparsely settled districts. We lose money on this, but make it up on the whole contract, as we can possibly reach 1,500 some days in the more thickly settled territory. We do 30 per cent of the foreign business brought to Kansas City—this is our best reference. Call on us; write us; call us—telephone 164.
